INFORMATION LAW DOCTRINE OF UKRAINE

The article is devoted to the development of various theoretical positions that are the basis of the Information Law doctrine of Ukraine. One of the innovations of the research is the inclusion of the fundamental provisions of the concept of knowledge societies into the legal model of information law science. It is established that in the conditions of the formation of a knowledge society in Ukraine, the law affects various information processes, identifying and supporting those areas that form the basis of a knowledge society. An attention is paid to the fact that the Information Law doctrine of Ukraine forms the corresponding complex branch of law. It is proved that the science of Information Law may establish such legal models that can be used to “manage” the future due to the philosophical and methodological aspects of information, i.e. providing “advanced” display of reality. It is shown that the updated paradigm of the Information Law science is based on the requirement of the real human rights, overcoming digital and cognitive inequality. It is established that the foundation of the Information Law science is the general theory of law and state.

The prospects of use of information concept of the right to ensure the sustainability of the national system of law are substantiated, as well as the institutionalization of the integrative function of Information Law. Theoretical development of categories within the science of Information Law is updated. The author's point of view on the main provisions of the theory of information legal relations is formed. The attention is focused on the study of the feasibility of the new functions of Information Law – integration and prediction. The international character of Information Law is grounded. Constructive use of the concept of “international soft law” for the formation of Advanced Legal sources of Information Law in Ukraine is offered.
